

PHILOSOPHY OF LIFE

I really don't have a philosophy of life, but it is more like a feeling. So here I go: I think people are put here on Earth so they can do something, everyday no matter how small or how large. People I think are here as a test to see how far we can advance in a specific amount of time. We should be able to live life out to the fullest no matter how short or how long our life happens to be. I first started to think deeply about this when I was young in the children's hospital of Philadelphia where I had a major operation, which I will never forget. I believe people take life for granted until an ^{un-} ~~expected~~ life-threatening experience happens to them. I also think everyone should truly count their blessings everyday of their life.

It takes a negative experience like that to open someone's eyes and give them a positive experience like I've already have. And in the end you come out feeling better and stronger than ever. That is something that no amount of money can buy, but that little amount of weakness brings out a lifetime of happiness
